HIROSHI WATANABE

America is rattled. What started with Wall Street has spread across the land leaving many longing for a simpler time that probably never existed in the first place. But we are smart enough to know that it is not about a place; America has always been about her people. With our faith tested and, in some cases, tattered it would be easy to give in to fear and let the cracks divide. But that is not the path we have chosen. From the darkness there will be light, and always ...hope.

Hiroshi Watanabe was born in Sapporo, Japan. He graduated with a photography degree from the College of Art, at Nihon University in 1975. He moved to Los Angeles after graduation and began producing TV commercials, eventually establishing his own production company. He received an MBA from UCLA Business School in 1993. In 1995, he rekindled his passion for photography, and since then he has traveled extensively, photographing what he finds intriguing at that moment and place. In 2000, he closed the production company in order to devote himself entirely to the art of photography. His work has been published around the world, and has been exhibited in many galleries across the United States and Japan.
